Electric Block The Electric Block is a narrow passage located in the center of New York City's Financial District. It was named for its use as a power transfer point for electric lighting (and in the days of horse-drawn carriages, as a transfer point for a number of vehicles on the street). It is part of the East River Crossing project, and is being constructed as part of the Reade Street Tunnel project. The underground portion of the block, named the Reade Street Tunnel, opened in 2012.

Early Use In 1848, the first steam-powered vehicle in the city, a New York & Erie steamboat, was brought through the block. It is said to have changed its course when it realized it was in the center of the city's traffic. Cars were "pulled" through the underground tunnel at the behest of the electricians, and it was clearly marked at street level with a sign posted with the words "Electric Crossing." Since cars would drive through only from Manhattan to Brooklyn, drivers would need to make a signal, probably with a light, in order to transfer their vehicles. This marked the end of the tunnel. Although the name of the tunnel and the block was changed to the Reade Street Tunnel, and eventually the name of the block was changed to the Eastern Boulevard, the electrician's practice of pulling vehicles through the block continued until 1875, when the practice was changed.

Current Use The Electric Block is now used for a variety of purposes, but the most common use is for traffic to transfer across the East River. It is part of the East River Crossing project, which includes the Washington Bridge, Goethals Bridge, Hoyt-Schermerhorn Streets, and the Brooklyn Battery Tunnel. Its proximity to the Brooklyn Heights Promenade (which connects to the Battery Maritime Building) means it is part of the city's main tourist area, especially in the summer. Another major use of the block is for visitors to the United States Military Academy at West Point. The Electric Block is located on the grounds of the Academy, and is part of the U.S. Army's entrance. It is also used by the Army Corps of Engineers, who maintain the block as part of the East River Tidal Basin project, and by the Port Authority, which has offices on the top level.
